Join the 2017-18 BARA Internship Program!

BARA interns will work in collaboration with several local and regional organizations to gather and analyze data to help them increase food security and sovereignty, guide teen males to healthy adulthood, provide support to refugees youth and their families, and more.

Working directly with faculty and graduate students, interns learn and conduct ethnographic research – including participant observation, interviews, and surveys – while also providing direct assistance to local and regional organizations. Students learn to analyze data and share their findings with the organizations via oral presentations and written reports and also have the opportunity to present their findings at an academic conference.

Receive academic credit for hands-on methods training and research experience!
